Our Town: D. C. Boundary Stones Historian’s Nightmare
By Christine Sailer

Another of those things that assure the newcomer to the District of Columbia is that the city has more trouble locating its boundary lines than any other city, and they are trying to keep them without a fight.

The boundaries of the District of Columbia are established by the U.S. government, and they are enforced by the city’s boundary police. The boundaries are marked by stone monuments, called boundary stones, that are placed along the border of the District. These stones are often referred to as “boundary stones” or “boundary marks.”

The boundary stones are important because they define the boundaries of the District and help to prevent any disputes over the location of the border. The stones are usually made of stone and are placed at intervals along the border. They are often inscribed with the name of the District or the district line.

The boundary stones are maintained by the city and are periodically checked to ensure that they are in good condition. The stones are also inspected to make sure that they are not being moved or altered in any way.

The boundary stones are an important part of the history of the District of Columbia and are a testament to the city’s long history of boundary disputes. The stones are a reminder of the history of the District and its boundaries, and they serve as a symbol of the city’s dedication to maintaining its boundaries.

While the boundary stones are an important part of the history of the District of Columbia, they are also a source of great frustration for many residents. The boundary stones are often referred to as “boundary marks,” and they are a constant reminder of the city’s boundary disputes. The stones are often a source of great confusion for residents, who are constantly trying to determine their location and determine if they are inside or outside the District.

The boundary stones are also a source of great controversy, as some residents believe that they are an unnecessary expense and that the city should be more focused on other issues.

Despite the challenges posed by the boundary stones, the city of Washington is committed to maintaining them and ensuring that they are in good condition. The boundary stones are an important part of the history of the District, and they serve as a reminder of the city’s dedication to maintaining its boundaries.
